Northern California-based food startup Ripple's new line of nut- and soy-free milks are so good that they'll delight both allergen-avoiders and vegans alike. Made from nutrient-rich pea protein, flavors such as Vanilla and Chocolate boast eight times the protein of almond milk, and were designed to have a milk-like mouthfeel—making them perfect for our morning smoothies, cereals, or baking into vegan desserts. ripplefoods.com

Summer wedding season might have come to a close, but San Francisco-based Miss Jones Baking Co. has us floating on a buttercream dream well into fall with its Chocolate and Vanilla dairy-free frostings. Made from powdered sugar, sustainable palm oil, agave, vanilla, and sea salt, each retro-designed tub of organic icing is sinfully sweet with an elegantly soft texture, elevating our baked goods into seriously sophisticated desserts. missjones.co

Sir Kensington's Fabanaise isn't your average vegan mayonnaise. With a light flavor and a whipped, fluffy texture—thanks to aquafaba, the water left over from cooked garbanzo beans—this creamy spread (available in Classic and Chipotle) tastes great on everything from a BLT to a roasted vegetable sandwich. The best part? Fabanaise is made with bean water from a large hummus producer that would otherwise go to waste. Now that's what we call a real miracle food! sirkensingtons.com

Similar to the rest of its product line, Juice Beauty's new Ultra-Natural Mascara (developed by actress Gwyneth Paltrow, the brand's creative director) is free of harmful chemicals that we don't want near our peepers. But the company ups the ante with this good-for-your-lashes tube by replacing conventional dyes with plant-derived phyto-pigments such as purple carrot, rose, and argan powder, resulting in a clump-free product that feels good on your eyes and your conscience. juicebeauty.com
